Genetic Endowments and the Long-Run Health Returns to Compulsory Schooling

Genetic differences tied to educational attainment predict later-life success and wellbeing. I study whether they also moderate the causal effect of education on physical health in old age. Using data on individuals aged 65 to 85 from the English Longitudinal Study of Ageing, I exploit the 1947 raising of the school leaving age in the UK from 14 to 15 in a fuzzy regression discontinuity setting to estimate the causal effect of schooling on frailty, the share of age-related health deficits. I estimate interactions with an educational attainment polygenic index (EA PGI), a DNA-based measure of genetic propensity for education. Health returns to schooling rise in the EA PGI, from nearly zero in its lowest quintile to a 6 percentage point reduction in frailty in the highest. This gradient points to a complementarity between genetic endowments and education. These health improvements originate at the upper part of the frailty distribution. I further show that the EA PGI affects educational choices in response to the schooling reform. Using marginal treatment effects, I find that these differences in choice behavior do not explain the health returns to education.
